Publications

“Reciprocity and the Ethics of Giving During Pandemics” (with Justin Bernstein), Journal of Social Philosophy. Published online March 19, 2021. <https://doi.org/10.1111/josp.12408>
This paper argues that individuals have obligations grounded in reciprocity to provide charitable assistance to those who are burdened by social distancing, in virtue of the fact that social distancing creates a non-excludable good in the form of reduced viral transmission rate.

“Against the Public Goods Conception of Public Health” (with Justin Bernstein), Public Health Ethics 13, no. 3 (2020). <https://doi.org/10.1093/phe/phaa021>
This paper critiques the view that public health essentially involves the production of public goods related to health or medicine. We argue that the idea of public goods does little work in delimiting the concept of public health in these theories, and that the idea that public agencies tasked with promoting public health ought to focus on the production of public goods is insufficiently motivated.

“Restating Statist Theories of Territory,” comment on Margaret Moore’s A Political Theory of Territory, Philosophy & Public Issues 6, no. 1 (2016).

In this paper, I argue that both statist and nationalist theories of territorial jurisdiction rights (which hold that states or peoples, respectively, are the primary bearer of territorial rights) are inadequate, and sketch a hybrid view that avoids the problems of both camps.

Forthcoming

“The Reasonable Bases of Populist Elite Resentment” (accepted for edited volume)

This paper argues that, although populist movements are substantively wrong on many issues and evince a troubling lack of commitment to democratic norms, they are motivated by popular resentment of elite behavior and norms. The paper analyzes populist resentment as a negative reactive attitude, and argues that the bases of elite resentment are, on many issues, reasonable.

“Justifications for Harming and Intelligence Ethics” (accepted for edited collection on intelligence ethics)

This chapter examines different rationales for overcoming the presumption against doing harm in intelligence collection and their limitations when applied to human intelligence collection (HUMINT).
